Now That's A Tree!

In the Redwood Forest of California there lives a tree, affectionately known as the "General Sherman". This giant sequoia has been around for a mere 3,200 years. Can you imagine a tree surviving the elements for 3,200 years? The bark of this great tree is 2 feet thick which has protected it against the weather, insects, fire and who knows what else over the past 32 centuries. Imagine a 27 story building, that's how tall the General Sherman is. 275 feet tall with a trunk circumference of 102 feet at the base, that's about 35 feet in diameter, or the width of a three lane highway. The total volume of this massive tree is said to be about 52,500 cubic feet, and is estimated to contain over 630,000 board feet of timber, enough to build about 50 2,000 square foot homes. The trunk alone weighs nearly 1,400 tons, roughly equivalent to 20 M-60 battle tanks, or 8 diesel-electric train locomotives. With all these impressive stats, it's easy to understand why it's considered one of the 7 natural wonders of the world and to date is the largest living thing on Earth.
